

The American public owns the nation's airwaves but apparently Sinclair Broadcasting believes it has the right to shove their partisan political views onto the public with no attempt at fairness or balance.

The FCC has an obligation to monitor and enforce fairness and balance, especially at a time when media power becomes increasingly consolidated into the hands of the few. Or has that become the problem with the FCC as well?

Allowing Sinclair to air this anti-Kerry documentary without any adherence to a fairness doctrine -- while going into overdrive over Janet Jackson's tit-reveal -- begs the question of just where is the FCC these days?

Get back to enforcing the real threats to democracy -
- make media ownership rules mean something.
Thank you.
